A free, non-medical support program for people with serious illnesses
Glenn White, Sr. (left) of Berlin wanted to earn his GED degree, and Compass coordinator, Mark Massey, is helping him arrange that while White deals with cancer. Compass is also arranging a weekly food delivery to White and his wife. Massey visits with White once or twice a month. “It keeps me mentally strong, knowing I’m not fighting this alone,” White says.

How Compass has helped your neighbors

June and John Allen Owens of Salisbury thought they were planning ahead when they purchased long-term care insurance. When they tried to start using their benefits, the insurance company sent a representative, but the couple was still unsure how to access services. A Compass associate intervened, and now Owens is receiving the in-home care he needs, fully paid for by his insurance. “We wouldn’t have been able to get this done if Compass hadn’t helped us out,” Owens says.

Compass points the way but lets you steer the ship

Living with a serious illness can be like navigating through a storm without any direction. In fact, illnesses such as cancer, heart disease, lung disease, liver disease, stroke, Alzheimer’s, Parkinson’s and kidney failure can rob you of your ability to live life on your own terms.

These illnesses can drain your energy and spirit, and prevent you from managing your basic needs. Without community and social support, it’s all too easy to feel overwhelmed as you and your family attempt to juggle new responsibilities.

Compass is a free, non-medical program for individuals and families coping with a serious illness. Compass provides guidance and resources to help make life a little easier. Please call and talk with our program coordinator to find out how Compass can help you.
